Definitions: For the purpose of this policy

Gift – or donation, these terms may be used interchangeably. Something given willingly to TWU Libraries without payment; a present.

Policy:

The TWU Libraries are grateful for offers of gifts of materials to enhance its collections. Gifts to TWU Libraries are a generous way to honor friends, family, and individuals. Such gifts are often unique, rare, or distinctive and may include books, maps, media, archives, artifacts, digital content, manuscripts, personal papers, photographs, letters and correspondence, art, uniforms, textiles, organizational records, personal/historical memorabilia and ephemera, and other scholarly material. These gifts enrich our existing collections and support the instructional and research programs of the university.

TWU Libraries are mindful of the resources required for handling, processing, accessioning, cataloging, preserving, storing and making gifted materials available to its users. TWU Libraries review all gifts before acceptance. The Libraries may decline to accept certain gifts including those which are not within the scope of its collections or that do not support the instructional and research programs of the university. Gifts may not be accepted if they duplicate existing material in the Libraries' collections or if their condition would require extensive preservation or preparation before they could be added to the collections.

Gifts are accepted and added to the collection if they meet purchasing (selection) criteria and support the University’s academic and research programs as outlined in the Collection Development Policy. After receipt of any gift, donors will receive a letter of acknowledgement. For donors wishing to claim a charitable tax deduction, the IRS requires that gifts of $5,000.00 or more be professionally appraised at the cost of the donor. Due to university regulations, library staff are unable to place monetary values on any portion of a gift.

All gifts become the property of TWU Libraries. The Libraries generally do not make formal commitments concerning shelving, housing, processing, or final disposition of gifts unless specifically noted in writing by the donor. The Libraries are obliged to process all materials whether purchased or gifted in a cost-effective manner. This necessitates following routine and standard procedures as closely as possible.

TWU Libraries does not generally accept gifts with restrictions or conditions. If either of these are requested as part of a gift, the donor must consult with the Special Collections department. For more information on this, contact the Special Collections department (940-898-3751).
